By leveraging Nemours Children's expertise and resources, the transition will enhance pediatric care while allowing patients to continue receiving the care they know and trust close to home.

"Our priority is to make this process seamless for patients and families," said Conor P. Delaney, M.D., Ph.D., president of Cleveland Clinic Florida Market. "By working with Nemours Children's Health, we are building upon Cleveland Clinic Martin Health's strong legacy and local presence, while expanding access to world-class pediatric expertise and services that support the health and well-being of children throughout our region."

The transition builds on an already established collaboration between the two organizations. Pediatricians and neonatologists from Nemours Children's currently support Cleveland Clinic Tradition Hospital's neonatal intensive care and inpatient pediatric units while also providing pediatric care in the hospital's emergency department. Connecting Cleveland Clinic Martin Health's ambulatory pediatric clinics with Nemours will further strengthen coordination across outpatient and hospital-based care.

Before the transition, patients will continue to receive care at the same office locations, helping provide continuity for children and families.

Cleveland Clinic Martin Health pediatric primary care services are expected to officially transition to Nemours Children's Health in the first quarter of 2027, pending any required regulatory approvals.
